At one point, a couple of us were in philosophy class at Princeton and the professor wanted to kill the career of ethics. He wanted to get rid of all of those who were going to be working in the field. And that was, you know, one of our professors and I think this was the first semester, and we were sitting in the back. And he wanted us to be in the front row because the class was small, and he needed a sure bet that we’d be okay that we’d be okay, you know, because I don’t think he wanted to spend $600 on him if we were going to be a liability to him. And so he called on me, and I said, “Oh, I would certainly appreciate not being in the front row.” I said, “I am not an ethical person, I am one who wants to be able to go forward. I am not a committed ethical person.” I said, “I want to be able to enjoy my work and enjoy making money, and I don’t believe in morality.” And I really didn’t. And I was — and the reason why is, I know when I lie and when I lie I know it. I know it, and I know when I tell the truth I know it. And I want to be able to enjoy my work, be able to make my living and not worry about doing the right thing because we, we have done the right thing.” And I think that he kind of, you know, was a little bit shocked and he said, “Well, if you feel that way, why did you take ethics in the first place?” And I said, “I took it because I thought it would be fun, and I found it incredibly boring.” And so I was kind of — so I was — you know, that was the kind of... I found it very easy to believe in principles, but very hard to be an ethical person.
