Introduction ===== Craniofacial defects constitute a serious proportion of congenital malformations, and occur in 0.02% of all births \[[@REF1]\]. The most common presentations are due to an abnormality of the frontal and/or parietal bones, which can occur in isolation or as part of a syndrome. A congenital craniosynostosis presents as an acrocephaly with a structurally abnormal sagittal suture. Treatment is primarily surgical with a prophylactic cranial vault reshaping, providing the frontal and parietal bones move in the correct direction and fuse. We describe an infant presenting with a number of symptoms, including failure to thrive and severe neurological deficits in a newborn with craniosynostosis. Case presentation ===== A female neonate was born following an uneventful term pregnancy, with birth weight of 2.7 kg. She was born via spontaneous vaginal delivery and was noted to have a depressed neuro-exomphalos at birth. She was admitted to the neonatal intensive care unit (NICU) for 11 days, with feeds started at 16 g/day. A multidisciplinary team was created to review the patient's history and findings. She was diagnosed with craniosynostosis with a depressed skull base and a 6.4 x 3.1 x 3.2 cm craniosynostotic defect involving the left coronal and left sagittal sutures. The rest of her skull was of normal
